DA: Woman in fatal crash was driving drunk

Prosecutors said the Dorchester woman who ran over a mother and her 7-year-old daughter, killing the young girl, may have been almost five times over the legal limit.

Olivia Mora, 36, pleaded not guilty on Tuesday at her arraignment on various charges after being indicted for the November crash.

Authorities said Mora hit Brianna Rosales and her mother as the two walked home along Olney Street. METRO

The contents of 15-year-old accused murderer Philip Chism's cellphone have been turned over to the former Danvers High School student's legal team. On Monday, the prosecution filed motions seeking access to information including a map of the school's security cameras and copies of all documents found in Chism's locker and backpack. Judge to rule on Patrick's painkiller ban on Monday

Drug debate.
The painkiller's maker disputes the governor's declaration of an emergency.

A federal judge hinted that she is willing to strike down the state's ban on one brand of painkillers at the request of the drug maker, but gave state officials more time to prepare their argument.

The maker of Zohydro and lawyers for the state appeared in federal court Tuesday to argue the banning of the drug after Gov. Deval Patrick declared a public health emergency last month citing an "epidemic of opiate abuse."

"The governor is out of line on this," said Judge Rya Zobel.

Zobel gave the state until a new hearing on Monday morning to make its case after an assistant attorney general argued that her office had only received the case Tuesday morning. Zobel also said she wanted to hear the full argument before making her decision.

Zogenix, the California-based drug maker, filed a motion in federal court on Monday that seeks to stop the state's ban on its drug, Zohydro.

Assistant Attorney General Jo Ann Shotwell Kaplan argued that Zogenix's request for an injunction was not immediately necessary because no one in the state is currently using the drug. Zobel questioned Kaplan as to why the state didn't contact Zogenix before the ban.

Kaplan said that the state had to act fast before people started using the drug and then would find themselves without it, which would have been dangerous.

Steven Hollman, a lawyer for Zogenix, estimated that thousands of patients could benefit from the drug.

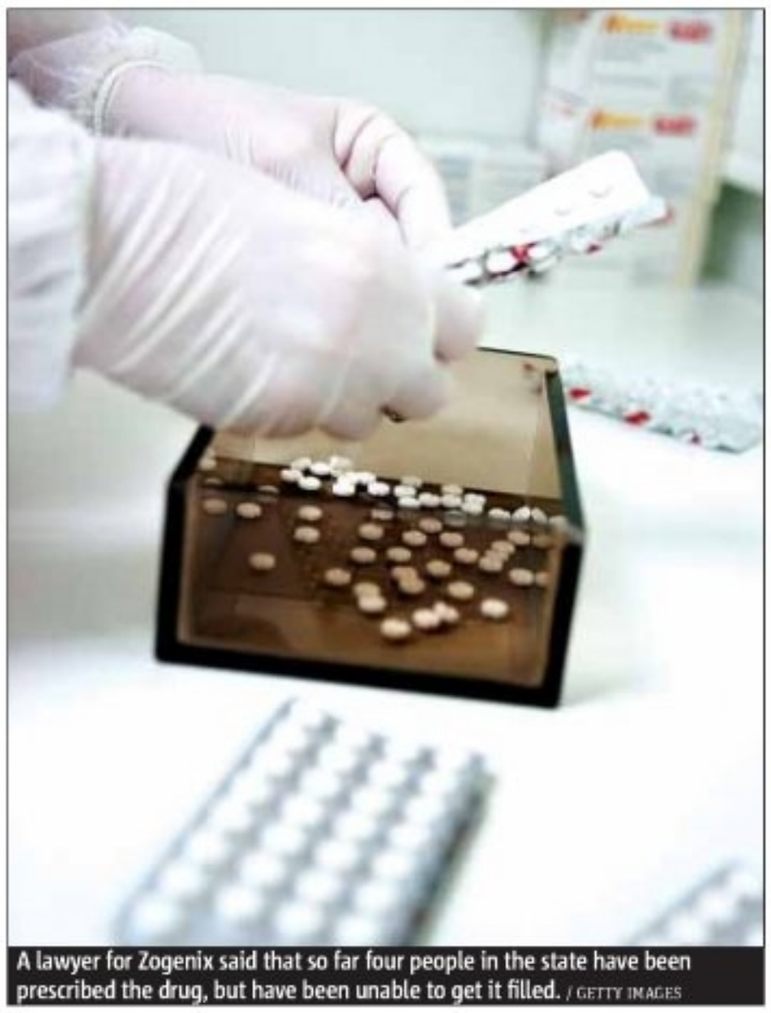
"What's the emergency here," Hollman said in court. "The emergency is the opioids already on the market."

Arguments

Drug maker makes its case

Among the steps taken by the state as part of the public health emergency was the immediate prohibition of the prescribing and dispensing of any hydrocodone-only formulation until adequate measures are in place to safeguard against potential overdose and misuse.

In court documents, Zogenix said that Zohydro is the only drug in the category targeted by the state. The company also argues that the drug, which tackles severe pain in patients requiring continuous around-the-clock opioid therapy, was approved by the Food and Drug Administration in October and that the state is overstepping the FDA's authority.



A lawyer for Zogenix said that so far four people in the state have been prescribed the drug, but have been unable to get it filled. / GETTY IMAGES

Remy used chair, soap in prison attack

Details of accused murderer Jared Remy's recent alleged prison assault became public on Monday.

Court records show that Remy, who is awaiting trial for the murder of his fiancee, Jennifer Martel, attacked a fellow inmate with a chair, bar of soap and hot liquid, the Boston Globe reported.

A reason for the alleged attack at the Cambridge prison has not been given.

Quoted

"Under the best of circumstances, jail is a very difficult place. There is a constellation of circumstances that may be at the bottom of this incident."

Remy's lawyer

Remy is scheduled to be arraigned April 24 in Cambridge District Court on nine assault charges stemming from the incident, and will enter a plea of not guilty, his lawyer told the Globe.

"Under the best of circumstances, jail is a very difficult place," Remy's lawyer Edward P. Ryan told the Globe. "There is a constellation of circumstances that may be at the bottom of this incident. I expect to investigate the matter fully and prepare an appropriate defense."

Remy has pleaded not guilty to murdering Martel, the mother of his daughter, in August. He is accused of repeatedly stabbing her during an argument at the couple's Waltham apartment. MEGAN JOHNSON

PoeTry coming to a trolley near you

Mass Poetry. MBTA ad space is being filled with visionary verses.

Poetic passengers riding the Green Line should pay attention, because through mid-June and possibly throughout the end of the summer, they will be able to enjoy poems about inspiration, community and diversity.

Mass Poetry, a group that launched six years ago to celebrate the art of poetry, has kicked off Poetry on the MBTA in celebration of National Poetry Month. The group purchased ad space on the Green Line's C-branch through May, and an anonymous sponsor will allow the poems to stay on trolley walls through June 15.

But the wise words may not end there. Mass Poetry is kicking off an IndieGoGo funding campaign to raise money for three additional months of poems.

"Our hope is that after that there will be a lot of interest, and that we can take that to potential sponsors of the program," said Mass Poetry Program Director Laurin Macios.

Each poem also appears on a tear-pad in the corner so riders can take a poem home with them. Passengers are also encouraged to snap a #poeTryselfie of themselves with a poem, and tweet it to @masspoetry or post it on the group's Facebook page.

The project is an arm of the group's program Poetry in Public Spaces, which seeks to take poetry to people rather than have people seek it out.

Mass Poetry Co-Founder Nicco Mele said his experience with poetry on New York's MTA system had a profound effect on him when he worked there 15 years ago.

He hopes the MBTA equivalent has a similar effect here.

"Part of putting these poems on the T is to just bring a little bit of joy and reflection to our lives. With technology and mobile phones, we sometimes get lost in being constantly tuned into the present," said Mele.

Quoted

"Our hope, and the main reason we're doing this, is to enrich people's lives with poetry. It can bring so much joy to someone's day." Macios

T joins global fight against transit harassment

Global Guardian.
MBTA: Sexual assault is an underreported crime on the T.

The Boston Area Rape Crisis Center, Fenway Health, Hollaback! Boston and the MBTA are joining a transatlantic effort to call attention and respond to sexual harassment and assault on public transit.

Global Guardian expands on the T's 2008 crackdown on sexual assault and harassment. In this first year of what is expected to be an annual effort, police in London, Vancouver and Washington, D.C., will also participate in the operation.

"We want people to know that we care and take very seriously these crimes and that all people should feel safe reporting them to transit police. We will follow up and do investigations," said T Police Superintendent-in-Chief Joseph O'Connor.

In 2013, there were 46 reported assaults on the MBTA, according to O'Connor. So far this year, there have been 14 reports, but BARCC Executive Director Gina Scaramella said she anticipates that more people will come forward as public awareness is stirred.

Transit Police will be providing fliers to riders this week with information that can be downloaded to mobile devices.

John Kerry accuses Russian agents of stirring Ukraine unrest

Finances. The Kremlin's standoff with the West has knocked investors' confidence in the Russian economy.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry accused Russian agents and special forces on Tuesday of stirring separatist unrest in eastern Ukraine, saying Moscow could be trying to prepare for military action as it had in Crimea.

Armed pro-Moscow protesters were still occupying Ukrainian government buildings in two cities in the largely Russian-speaking east on Tuesday, although police ended a third occupation in a lightning nighttime operation.

Ukraine's security service said separatists occupying the security headquarters in Luhansk had planted bombs in the building and were holding as many as 60 hostages. Activists in the building denied they had explosives or hostages, but said they had seized an armory full of automatic rifles.

The Ukraine government says the occupations that began on Sunday are part of a Russian-led plan to dismember the country. Kerry said he feared Moscow might repeat its Crimean operation.

"It is clear that Russian special forces and agents have been the catalyst behind the chaos of the last 24 hours," he said in Washington, and this "could potentially be a contrived pretext for military intervention just as we saw in Crimea."

Tensions between China and the United States were on full display on Tuesday as Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel faced questions in Beijing about America's position in bitter territorial disputes with regional U.S. allies.

Chinese Defense Minister Chang Wanquan, standing side-by-side with Hagel, called on the United States to restrain ally Japan and chided another U.S. ally, the Philippines.

Then, Hagel was sharply questioned by Chinese officers at the National Defense University. One of them told Hagel he was concerned that the United States was stirring up trouble in the East and South China Sea because it feared someday "China will be too big a challenge for the United States to cope with."

"Therefore you are using such issues ... to make trouble to hamper [China's] development," the officer said. REUTERS

Ships unable to find signal from MH370

Still missing. No new signals have been detected since two locator beacons were heard over the weekend.

Australian Defense Minister David Johnston responds to a reporter together with Air Chief Marshal Angus Houston during a press conference. / GETTY IMAGES

An Australian ship that picked up possible "pings" from the black box recorders of a missing Malaysia Airlines jetliner has been unable to detect any further signals, and time is running out to narrow the massive search, officials said Tuesday.

Angus Houston, head of the Australian agency coordinating the search for Malaysia Airlines Flight MH370, said the month-long hunt in the Indian Ocean was at a critical stage given the batteries in the black box beacons had already reached the end of their 30-day expected life.

Quoted

"If we don't get any further transmissions, we have a reasonably large search area of the bottom of the ocean to prosecute, and that will take a long, long time. It's very slow, painstaking work." Houston

A U.S. Navy "towed pinger locator" onboard Australia's Ocean Shield picked up two signals consistent with black box locator beacons over the weekend — the first for over two hours and the second for about 13 minutes.

Houston said the signals represented the best lead in the search yet, but efforts to pick up the pings again had so far been unsuccessful. REUTERS

Emotional witness.
Pistorius breaks down as he recounts the shooting

South African Olympic and Paralympic sprinter Oscar Pistorius sobbed on the witness stand Tuesday as he described how, gripped by fear, he fatally shot his girlfriend through a locked toilet door thinking she was an intruder.

Taking the witness stand, the double amputee — accused of murdering 29-year-old law graduate and model Reeva Steenkamp — recounted hearing a window sliding open in his bathroom in the middle of the night on Valentine's Day 2013.

Conditioned by years of living in crime-ridden South Africa, Pistorius said the noises convinced him someone was breaking into his luxury home and that he needed to protect himself and his lover.

"That's the moment that everything changed," he said, his voice tense with emotion. "I thought that there was a burglar that was gaining entry to my home."

"The first thing that ran through my mind was that I needed to arm myself, that I needed to protect Reeva and that I needed to get my gun," said the 27-year-old, who faces life in prison if convicted of murder. REUTERS

"I just stayed where I was and kept on screaming. Then I heard a noise from inside the toilet that I perceived to be somebody coming out of the toilet. Before I knew it, I had fired four shots at the door."

US contractor jailed in Cuba goes on hunger strike

The U.S. contractor sentenced to a 15-year prison term in Cuba for attempting to establish an illegal Internet service has gone on a hunger strike to protest his treatment by the Cuban and U.S. governments, his lawyer said Tuesday.

The lawyer also criticized the United States for putting Alan Gross' life in further jeopardy by launching a secretive "Cuban Twitter" after his arrest in 2009.

Gross, 64, was a subcontractor for the U.S. Agency for International Development when he was arrested on his fifth trip to Cuba in an attempt to establish an online network for Jews in Havana.

In 2011, a Cuban court sentenced him to 15 years in prison, adding greater tension to already fraught U.S.-Cuban relations. REUTERS

Peaches Geldof: What happened?

When a celebrity dies, everyone turns into Sherlock Holmes. We all assume we know exactly what happened, and there's talk of drugs and overdoses long before autopsy results are public. However, in the case of British socialite Peaches Geldof, who died on Monday, conventional wisdom may be off the mark.

Police found "no evidence of hard drugs, no visible signs of injury and no suicide note" at the scene of Peaches' death at her home in Kent, according to Hello. Police are treating it as a "non-suspicious, but unexplained, sudden death."

Stay tuned. MELINDA TAUB

Celebrities get colorful

So, slow gossip days mean round-ups of new celebrity hair styles! I know: My job IS exciting!

First up is Maggie Gyllenhaal, who channeled Michelle Williams at the Cannes Film Festival on Monday night. The choice was a bit more conventional than Katy Perry's, who showed off her new 'do on Instagram on Tuesday with the tag line "Slime green for spring, duh."

Speaking of green, Lady Gaga had a bit of the hue in her wild hair while closing down the Roseland Ballroom on Monday night.

Miranda Kerr vs. hairy man

Who is sexier: Dom Nader (below) or Miranda Kerr?

Before you answer that, read what Dom Nader — who parodied Kerr's nude shoot for the May issue of British GQ — has to say about how men and women are portrayed in glossy magazines.

"Why aren't men sexualized in the same way as women?" argues the Sydney-based artist to Metro World News. He adds: "Men try to sexualize everything, whether it be girls in men's glossies or men in gay mags; women don't do this in the same way."

Eh. We still give Kerr the "sexier" label. Sorry, Nader.

Next up for Nader — who has gone viral with the stunt — is taking on what is probably the worst trend in celebrity photography: the pregnant nude shot.

"Nude pregnancy shoots seem to be a big deal at the moment," he notes. "That seems to be selling magazines so we might see if a big 'food baby' on a big nude man has a similar effect."

Keith Urban on what it takes to win 'Idol'

Talent. The singer and "American Idol" judge talks giving advice — and why it doesn't work for everyone.

As a musician, Keith Urban has had plenty of experience in the spotlight. Now, as a judge on "American Idol," he's able to share some of the wisdom he picked up along the way.

"The most important thing I wanted to be able to do was help them, because a lot of the times I see artists struggling with something that is very simple to fix," Urban says. "In my case, it's things that I've had to figure out how to do — how to perform properly, how to choose songs properly — and I think a lot of that can be taught."

Of course, it takes more than a few lessons with an idol for these "Idol" hopefuls to come out on top. Raw talent is a huge factor when trying to break into the music industry, but Urban, along with fellow judges Harry Connick Jr. and Jennifer Lopez, is looking for a certain drive in the contestants.

"It's not just about having the talent — it's about having the passion for it," Urban says. "Winning 'Idol' doesn't automatically catapult you into the stratosphere. You have to then set about finding the songs and making a record, then you've got to go out and do all the interviews. You've got to be able to do all the work."

Now in his second season on the show, the Australian has learned that his advice doesn't always apply: As artists, the contestants must be able to figure out what works for them. "We can be offering all this advice," he explains, "but they also have individualism and originality about them, which can defy every single thing we are saying. They could go against every single thing and create something extraordinary."

What a feeling

Country music has had a strong presence on "American Idol" this season. As a country singer himself, Urban is most familiar with this type of music — but he doesn't let that affect his judgment.

"I just respond to a feeling. It's not even about genre. It's got everything to do with the sense of believability and authenticity and feeling," he says.

NICK FROST

The "Cuban Fury" star says he doesn't like to boogie unless it's his idea.

Nick Frost is often seen joined at the hip with his two best friends, Simon Pegg and Edgar Wright. But all three regularly go off on their own. Frost's latest solo work is "Cuban Fury," a "Marty"-like underdog rom-com in which he plays a sad sack who decides to reignite his youthful love for salsa dancing in order to win over his dream girl (Rashida Jones). Though he's credited with the story, it definitely isn't autobiographical.

Are you a dancer in real life?

I've always liked dancing. All my mates, all my male mates — we've all danced. We're not that type of people where, because of our heterosexual ego, we're afraid to dance. But I have a complex relationship with dance, which comes from the fact that I rarely want to do it if it's expected of me. If someone badgers me, "Do you wanna dance?" I would rather lose a foot than dance with that person.

Quoted

"Being a big man who can dance well, there's a weird look that thinner people who can dance give you, which is the look you give a 13-year-old boy who's overcome a terrible disease and gone on to complete a half-marathon."

Frost

I didn't want to dance at the wedding with my wife. I like dancing and my wife likes dancing, and we have danced a lot. But that's when you're out and about and you're having a disco or you're having a party.

You do dance well, though. Being a big man who can dance well, there's a weird look that thinner people who can dance give you, which is the look you give a 13-year-old boy who's overcome a terrible disease and gone on to complete a half-marathon. "Go for it, big guy!" F— that, f— you.

Why salsa? Had you done salsa a lot before?
No, not at all. And I had to get over how, in my culture, you don't dance with a girl. You're near someone. You don't hold them. There was a lot that was hard about the training, but the first two weeks of trying to avoid touching the top of someone's bum a little bit was hard. You have to get over that complete Hugh Grant-ness of being a gentleman.

How bad was the training?
It was seven hours a day, six days a week for seven months. It was amazing and terrifying in equal measure. That first hour of day one, I just thought, "F— this, I'm never going to be able to do this," because I'd never done anything like it before. You're essentially in a box of mirrors. Mirrors are everywhere. You can't even avoid looking at yourself murdering the thing your trainers love.

By the books

The story hews pretty close to a certain formula.

There's been criticism about the story being kind of done before. And it has. [Chuckles] That's how the underdog story works. There has to be a montage of the training process and he either gets the girl or doesn't get the girl, he scores the touchdown, he does a scorpion kick, like at the end of "The Karate Kid." It works as a formula. The comedy and the character, that's what puts us apart.

Housing. Located in a prime South Boston spot, the apartments are now open to rent.

One of Mayor Martin Walsh's more pleasant duties this winter was cutting the ribbon on another South Boston apartment building: Waterside Place. The 350,000-square-foot mixed-use space is on 3 acres of land between Congress and Summer Streets, adjacent to the MBTA Silver Line Station and the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. The company behind Waterside Place is the Drew Company, a Boston-based real estate development, management and consulting firm. The company developed the first buildings in the neighborhood, the Seaport Hotel and World Trade Center Boston Complex, helping move the Seaport away from its past of railway sidings and fish piers.

"For Drew Company president, John E. Drew, developing in the Seaport District made sense — opening up waterfront property to the city of Boston, attracting tourism and convention business into the area," says the company's Client Relations and Global Services representative, Rie Sugihara.

Since its founding, the Drew Company has developed spots like the Bayside Exposition Center, Constitution Plaza and what was once grandly known as the Great Woods Center for Performing Arts. It's better known by various corporate sponsored monikers, the latest of which is the Xfinity Center.

As for Waterside Place, it's walking distance to another arena that keeps changing its name: the Blue Hills Bank Pavilion, as it's now known, as well as some of the city's hottest restaurants and bars.

"The Drew Company believed that this area would become a vibrant neighborhood of Boston," adds Sugihara, "but certainly did not predict that the rate of growth would be as rapid as we have seen it to be."

Listen to your parent and work collaboratively to figure out the best type of care. / STOCKBYTE

Coping with caregiving

Family. Looking after aging parents can get overwhelming. Learn how to manage it all.

For adults with jobs, kids and other responsibilities, the challenges of caring for elderly parents should not be underestimated. Studies show caregivers often put their own health to the side: The National Alliance for Caregiving found that 72 percent of family caregivers report not going to the doctor as often as they should, 63 percent of caregivers say their eating habits have gotten worse, and 58 percent cop to exercising less. The National Alliance for Caregiving also says that as many as 70 percent of caregivers have symptoms of clinical depression.

In spite of these scary stats, "caregiving can be rewarding despite the challenges," says Care.com's vice president of senior care services, Jody Gastfriend. "But the caregiver must avoid caregiver burnout and subsequent health problems. While 80 percent of long-term care is provided by unpaid family members, the majority don't identify themselves as caregivers and don't seek support."

Advice and support can be found at local hospitals, senior centers, health clinics and online. Good primary care, for both the caregiver and parent, is essential. It starts with acquiring knowledge, Gastfriend says: "Adult children can educate themselves about the type of chronic illness their parent is suffering from and what type of care [that person] may need down the road. Sometimes changes in behavior and cognition are reversible, either related to an illness, medications or depression."

Conditions such as dementia and Alzheimer's disease can make staying at home an even greater challenge, as caregivers are often thinking for two.

"Keep options open and make decisions based on what is best for the care recipient as well as for the caregiver," Gastfriend advises. Sometimes, that means looking into outside help. "My father, who had dementia for over 10 years, spent half of that time in a nursing home. It was the best and safest place for him and for my mother, who eventually could not manage my dad's care."

Gastfriend, who cared for her mother, recommends being prepared for unexpected events and costs, like additional medical bills. Respecting that elderly parents are still parents, in addition, makes for better communication.

"Do not to look at caregiving as a role reversal," Gastfriend says. "It's important to help your loved one maintain a sense of control, however minimal, so that their dignity and sense of self is not completely undermined by their condition."

Diet. Can a spoonful of MCT oil help you drop extra pounds?

You can take a spoonful of MCT oil straight or add it to foods and drinks. / POLKA DOT

Doctors and nutrition experts are buzzing about MCT (medium-chain triglyceride) oil and its weight loss benefits. But is all the hype worth it?

MCT oil is usually derived from coconut oil (in some cases, palm oil), and can be stirred into a smoothie, drizzled on a salad or taken directly.

"The beauty of this oil is that it is digested very quickly, and you get a quick rush of energy. In a way it works like a carbohydrate, but it's actually a fat," says Dr. Frank Lipman, an integrative physician who has his own brand of MCT oil as part of his Be Well line of supplements.

"It's good for your metabolism. I'm a big fan of fat, and I don't think people eat enough fat," he continues.

Fitness and nutrition expert Aimee Nicotera, previously of Canyon Ranch and Equinox, agrees with him.

"Some of these studies have shown that MCT can actually help the process of calorie burning," she says.

Lipman says both men and women, young and old, can reap the oil's benefits. He recommends starting with half a tablespoon, then working up to one whole tablespoon.

As for why MCT is trending, Lipman says it's down to changing attitudes.

"People are becoming more aware that fats are healthy. People were always scared of fat, but now they're getting used to the fact that fat is healthy. And I think that people like it because you get a quick rush of energy."

Nicotera adds that people are always looking for ways to get better results.

"If we can figure out how we can lose fat and still eat fat — that's the essence of what we're doing here — who doesn't want that?"

LASSE EMIL KRISTIANSEN

The 99 percent are struggling, not brainless

Re: 'McCutcheon decision equals corruption of free speech in America' (Metro, April 7) How little you must think of the "99 percent" that you believe they could be hoodwinked by the "1 percent" (both liberals and conservatives) and that the only option is to restrict our First Amendment rights.

In America, we educate our children so they can see through lies, misdirections, and half-truths and recognize what is right.

If we aspire to be an informed electorate capable of choosing leaders with integrity, we have to defy the notion that our fellow citizens are incapable of listening to varied opinions and making intelligent decisions on issues that affect us.

I say let the people hear it all, from both the 99 percent and the 1 percent and let's get 100 percent of the story!

I, for one, will never accept that the truth can only be known by choosing who is allowed to say it! Our founders wrote the Constitution and Bill of Rights!

The First Amendment states: "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." They did not include an "at your convenience" clause!

MICHAEL TANNER, VIA EMAIL

Letter writer Suzanne Searle is perfectly right. Corporations are not people. They are persons, and that is a vital distinction.

Like many retired Americans I depend on a modest pension run by a corporation because only a person can legally manage one.

If the ideological mandarins like Searle change the legal status of corporations, I and millions of others will lose what little we have. Free speech means little to people who cannot put food on the table.

Eriksson with time to prove Seguin swap was worth it

NHL. Bruins forward Loui Eriksson seems to be putting it together just in time for the playoffs.

On a team full of players with impressive postseason resumes, don't be shocked if a guy who last appeared in the NHL playoffs in 2008 emerges as a key contributor for the Bruins these next few weeks.

It's been a largely disappointing first year in Boston for right wing Loui Eriksson [eight goals, 26 assists in 57 games], but he does own a legitimate excuse in that he suffered two concussions in a five-week span at the start of the season.

Strong second half

Loui Eriksson is coming into his own after suffering two concussions to start the season.

- Since winning a silver medal with Team Sweden in Sochi, Eriksson has put up 16 points and is a plus-7 in 20 games.
- Eriksson has given head coach Claude Julien another versatile player to deploy in any situation — power play, short-handed, even-strength — on multiple lines.
- Eriksson tallied 70-plus points in each of his last three fully healthy seasons.

After putting up a career-high four assists in last Saturday's 5-2 win over Philadelphia, it seems Eriksson is coming into his own. "I'm just trying to build off this and get better," he said. "This is a really good team to play for, we're not satisfied."

Those thinking Eriksson would easily replace Tyler Seguin, who he was traded for last summer, are overlooking the fact that they are two completely different players. Eriksson could soon prove to be a perfect, two-way threat.

"He seems comfortable in our system," noted head coach Claude Julien. "He keeps getting better and better and more consistent."

NBA power rankings | by James Toscano

No. 1

Spurs (60-17)

With the Spurs just a couple of wins away from earning home court advantage throughout the playoffs, Tony Parker will miss a few games with a sprained facet joint (back). His health is the biggest question mark for San Antonio heading into the playoffs, which begin on April 19.

No. 2

Thunder (55-21)

The Thunder snapped the Spurs' crazy winning streak, but dropped the next two on the road to the Rockets and Suns.

No. 3

Clippers (55-23)

We'll find out a great deal about which team deserves the No. 2 seed in the West when the Thunder invade Los Angeles on Wednesday.

No. 4

Heat (53-23)

The Heat had lost the three previous meetings against the Nets heading into Tuesday's showdown in Miami. A second round playoff preview?

No. 5

Rockets (51-25)

Dwight Howard has missed eight of the last 10 games. Telling you how important he is to Houston's chances would be insulting your intelligence.

No. 6

Pacers (53-25)

They're 3-8 in their last 11 games, with the most recent being a loss to the Hawks. If only they had a veteran leader like a Danny Granger.

No. 7

Blazers (50-28)

The Blazers clinched a playoff berth, but based on the way their season started, they're looking to do much more than that in the next few weeks.

No. 8

Warriors (48-29)

Mark Jackson's assistant coaches are getting the boot one-by-one. If the Warriors don't make any noise in the playoffs, he could be next.

No. 9

Suns (46-31)

After two losses to the Lakers and Clippers, Phoenix got back on track with wins over the Blazers on the road and the Thunder at home.

No. 10

Bulls (45-32)

With the bad teams that remain on the Bulls and Raptors schedule, whoever loses just once could end up as the No. 4 seed in the East.
